St Georges Church, Hanover Square

In the latter years of the 17th Century, London enjoyed an increase of prosperity, which resulted in a rapid growth of population. New and elegant suburbs began to cover the open country to the westward. There was very soon a need for the readjustment of Parish boundaries and for new places of worship. To meet this, in May 1711, Parliament passed an Act for the erection of fifty new churches in and about the Cities of London and Westminster. Ten years later the building of St. George's was begun on a plot of ground given by General William Stewart. The architect chosen was John James, one of Sir Christopher Wren's assistants.

The first stone was laid on June 20th 1721 during a grand ceremony. After the auspicious start, the Church took three and a half years to complete at a total cost of £10,000

The church had rarely been repaired over the years and before stone repair works could commence, a considerable amount of carbon deposits and encrustation up to 25mm thick had to be removed.

The results of such skill and care during the restoration is now there for all to admire.
